I have this name that is not mine alone and will not be, when I in time have nothing, and it is neither question nor description but a father’s voice when he was young.
And as his shadow falls into mine, the darkening field shivers with crickets, loudest in my stillness, when I am no one, when each name turns to the air inside it.
Soon the darkness dissolves the outline of the trees, their choir of one, our gods consumed by one god who will go nameless.
And I long to give that one my word for me, as those who worship idols would pass their burden to another to carry, to bless, to father, to figure in the chapel glass a shadow inside the shadow of our smallness.
