The garden’s ancient walls are low and broken and thus (yes, “even at my age”) easy to scale. They say this was a garden Goethe adored. I see him sketching: helicrysum, angelica (whose name reminds him of . . .)
and focused: parsing genus, species, love.
I’m sure he knew that cypress is the tree that marks Italian cemeteries, death embodied in the dark green spears that gesture toward heaven. I inhale: crisp vetiver, grapefruit and orange so pungent that I’m thrust back to another garden, where I learned of bitter oxymoron in the sweet and luscious fruit he fed me, piece by piece; the faintly musky warmth of his embrace;
the ancient stone walls crumbled, and my trust.
